Refugee self-reliance and inclusion in countries of asylum has a positive impact on integration prospects and the ultimate success of any future durable solution. In recent years, complementary pathways programmes have developed this idea further, clearly demonstrating the linkages between study and work experience in host countries and opportunities for third country solutions. At the same time, it is understood that refugee protection is the essential foundation for the development of skills and qualifications leading to greater self-reliance, and that protection interventions are themselves a means to identify refugees in need of or eligible for third country solutions. This panel will explore the links between protection interventions and self-reliance programmes in countries of asylum and third country solutions, as well as seek to highlight the inherent potential of making more explicit connections between them.
